

Politics of the Postcolonial Text: Africa and its Diasporas

By Tsaaior,

LINCOM. Softcover. Condition: Neu. Dust Jacket Condition: Neu. 1. Auflage. In their very historical constitution and derivation, politics is the essential and governing character of postcolonial cultures. In the same way, politics defines and gives energy to the postcolonial text. The political complexion of the postcolonial text registers itself in the fact that it is a counter-hegemonic text to the colonial text which is predatory. It is in this schema that the postcolonial text, in its essential political aspirations, participates in the production and circulation of cultural knowledge that is historically particular and ideologically positioned. These regimes of knowledge simultaneously interrogate and revise totalizing and absolutist modes of epistemologies and their accompanying hermeneutics which are decidedly prejudiced and uncharitable to that of Others. Through this strategy, the postcolonial text, inevitably, imposes on itself the project of recuperating and reconstituting the social and cultural histories of the postcolony as part of the knowledge infrastructure with which to assert its energies and cultural self-presence. This process of self-retrieval and self-renewal is symbolically significant and is central to the thematic concern of this book. Firstly, it represents an acknowledgement of a loss, lack or limitation and the determination to embark on a journey...
