Not illustrated. 1920 Excerpt: . . . to understand that one has not far to go in such a study as ours, before realising that the number of subjects of interest which cannot be conventionalised, cannot easily be surrounded by polygons nor subjected to the geometrical measurements or to analyses such as we have so far sketched, far outnumber those which submit themselves readily to these methods. Other means therefore have to be devised for the examination of these less manageable subjects and we shall treat them briefly in this chapter both for convenience sake and because many varying classes may be found to belong, on inspection, to the same natural or geometric family. The beauty of all of these forms has many times been keenly felt 1 From The Great Modules, C. Arthur Coan, 1914. when, perhaps, it could scarcely be expressed. Such a marvellous brain as that of Leonardo could conceive...
