A Now, if A, coming nearly into collision with B, could tell her which way to put her helm so as to agree with the movement she herself was making, less presence of mind on either side would be required, and there would be much greater certainty of avoiding accident. Let me take a single case illustrative of the uses of these lights. A and B discover each other on their starboard bows. B, being possessed of better eyes, and keeping a sharper lookout than A, forms an idea of A's course, and, following his common sense, starboards his helm. But B's lights are both bad, and badly placed, so A, laboring under his other disadvantages, is very far...
