Excerpt: . . . early in the seventeenth century the pueblo ceded to a body of discharged Spanish soldiers land for a settlement, on condition that the settlers would aid the pueblo in its defense against invaders. Thus, having been authorized as a bulwark, the town of Taos became an actuality. Today it has a population of some 1, 200, with the Mexicans far outnumbering the Americans, and with Mexicano the general tongue. The town is of adobe construction, and in typical Mexican fashion is built about a central plaza, or park: four sides of solid walls, save for the four streets and one lane, enclosing a grassy, shaded square. The Mexican plaza is an evolution of the old time corral. In times more rigorous, in primitive settlements, these plazas were but rudely fenced yards into which were herded transient stock, at night, while the owners camped around-- about, thus...
