Constituents.--The principal point of difference between the English and French oils is the variation of ester and cineol percentages. The finest French oils contain from 30 to 40 per cent. of esters (principally linalyl acetate), and the estimation of the ester content is the most useful means of comparing this class of lavender oils, and ensuring freedom from oil of spike. Spike oils contain practically no esters, and reduce the ester percentage proportionately to their presence. English oils only contain from 7 to 10 per cent. of esters (also principally linalyl acetate), and attempts to discredit the English oil on this account have been frequently made on the Continent. Cineol (see Oil of eucalyptus) is also present in very considerable quantity in English oils, and gives to it its characteristic pungency; mere traces are present in the...
