Adjectives, Qualities and States of the above. IV. Particles, Relations between these, connect ing or disjoining. A little practice on words serves to draw out distinctions and discriminations of differences, and is a delightful exercise in thinking and analysis for a class. If any one doubts, let him try it and see what life and reality it puts into the study. A School Newspaper. We all admit that a boy comes into the world to learn something about it; first of the world nearest and of today, next and afterwards of past times and things remote. Let him have his information instant and at first hand if possible. Everybody takes a newspaper now-a-days, a paper of some sort for his family reading, but the schools await theirs. A good one would take wonderfully, and as wonderfully improve the pupil s reading by interesting him in the contents. They need boys and girls alike, new class books adapted to their comprehension and celebrating their ordinary life, their extraordinary, their impulses, aspirations and inferences; their modes of thinking and feeling. We have none suitable. Nothing better nor surer to stimulate and feed an interest in their studies of the world than the introduction into their school of a class reading sheet. Call it The Globe, if you like, --The Atlantic News, --and give the classes the pleasure of opening it of a morning as it comes fresh from the world outside wet with intelligence,...
