And it was the same in love as in all else; his tenderness for women was bounded by no narrow limits; he loved in a wholesale, promiscuous, lavish way. A laughing black cupid, the shameless little rogue, tipped his whole quiverful of darts with the love-spell and twanged them at Masheen s susceptible bosom; and in so many places did the little love-god pierce his enjellied heart that he became quite hopelessly mixed as to his obligations. But it was as best man at weddings that Masheen Dyle shone in all his lustre. There his peculiar gifts found full scope; and he was always in great request. When he wished to mark his appreciation of the dignity of any social function he wore an eyeglass--he wore one at weddings....
