Not illustrated. 1909 Excerpt: . more practice I believe Demon Webster will be able to steer an auto on one wheel along a wire clothesline. I trust that when the tourists begin to crowd into this valley he may be there to show them what going over a trail really is. Folk who have bragged of riding slowbut-sure mules down into and up out of the Grand Canon, will, after five hours behind Demon Webster, realize that they have been loitering in the kindergarten of thrills, making paper butterflies and playing birdie on the tree. The trail sweeps out of Golden and takes the left bank of the Columbia. Immediately it attacks the mountain side. It goes up. It is just wide enough for the machine. Colonel Webster goes around corners with an airy grace that gives you wonder over what might happen to a for perhaps ten miles. Then you murmur the English for Kismet, which is the philosophic Arab way of intimating that you will trust to luck, and begin to look at the scenery. On one side the Selkirk Mountains lift and lift and lift themselves, peak piled on peak, with the eternal snow dripping down their sides, for all the world as though some giant had upset a skyful of cream upon them during the night. On the other side the Canadian Rockies rise and rise until they seem to be shouldering the skies. This, mind you, is not a simple view. It is not a...
