Excerpt: .and equally separated points of branching and the strong development of the lateral branching. All these features give to the group a uniform habit quite distinct from that of the other graptolites. dichotomous branching as one of the distinctive characters of Temnograptus. That in T. multiplex the branching is indeed monopodial liecomes evident in Nicholson s and Elles s drawings, which show that one of the branches resulting from the division follows the curvature of the mother branch, while the other alone assumes a new direction. Only the branches of the first order divide dichotomously; and it is hence probable that no difference can be found between this and Holm s genus Trochograptus, as according to Elles s table p.478 the mode of branching constitutes the only difference between the two. We believe, for these reasons, that Clonograptus milesi and Temnograptus multiplex belong to...
