Raymond, of New York, on the Conditional Admission of the States Lately in Rebellion to Representation in Congress Mr. Raymond - Mr. Speaker, I regard the action which this House may take upon the bill now before it as of very great importance. The bill embodies principles which touch very nearly the fundamental principles of our Government; and it proposes measures which must affect in a very serious manner the peace and welfare of the country. I venture to hope, Sir, that every member of this House will bring to its consideration a mind unbiased by prejudice and uninfluenced by passion, and that he will act upon it with sole and exclusive reference to its probable effect upon the prosperity and welfare of our common country. I know how difficult it is to withstand the influence of habit and association, personal and political, upon our action here; but if there ever was an occasion when it was incumbent upon each one of us to do all in our power thus to emancipate ourselves from undue and improper influences, I think, Sir, that occasion is offered by the bill which now awaits our action. When this Congress met, Sir, now seven months ago, the war against the rebellion had been closed for half a year. The President of the United States, exercising what he believed to be his rightful authority as the chief Executive of the nation and Commander-in-Chief of its armies, had set in motion the machinery of government in the States where it had been suspended by rebellion. He had appointed Provisional Governors, by...
