Excerpt: . . . rambled up the lanes and hedges filling baskets with filberts and blackberries, playing at gipsies, as they called it, and coming home with sun-browned faces and cheeks glowing with health and happiness. Is papa coming back to-night asked Hubert, as he strolled up the lane cutting an elder stick into shape. Mr. Vivian had been away for three days, and was expected that evening; but he had left no exact information as to the hour of his return, and, as usual, troubled himself little about his children. Lately, however, things had gone more smoothly at home. The servants had become used to the country; under Mr. Everards influence, and with his and Makepeaces help, the house and garden began to assume a more civilised appearance; and since the memorable fishing expedition, Hubert and Ronny had managed to keep clear of any serious scrape. Last week, too, Mr. Vivian had sent down a piano from town, and Ella was enchanted with her new possession, and felt sure she should never complain of Sunningvale again. Every one was so kind too, Mrs. Miles, and Bertie and Mr. Everard; and there was Miss Willmar, who lent her books, and had even promised to give her music lessons now the new piano had come. But this week Bertie had gone to town with his mother, and Miss Willmar had taken a holiday, so the Hall was deserted for a time. The London train had come in when the children...
