Not illustrated. 1903 Excerpt: .during the nine s sudden slump, and there in a two hours talk told him what the team needed--in short, a new captain with ideas exactly like those held by the wise right fielder. Indeed, it has been said that Jay received more college confidences long before he was a freshman than were entrusted to the most popular undergraduate. Whether this saying is true or not there is really no telling, for Jay never seemed able to appreciate the delicious spice of student gossip. Besides, at times his memory served him exasperatingly ill. It comes from the manager of one of the least promising football teams that he subscribed ten dollars to the cause without so much as being thought of as a possible contributor, and once, as everybody knows, when the game was going the wrong way, he gathered a crowd of schoolmates about him on the bleachers near third base and started to yell for Brown. This little act of chivalry stirred the students on the grandstand to the cheers that helped bring the score round into a victory. It is strange, but Jay never was rushed. For a year or two in his early teens he went about in an impartial way, making no fraternity distinctions whatever. As far as could be seen, he found little difference between a Top and a Tip, and that little altogether in their pins. Why the fellows of the gang, as the men who sat on the...
