When I was at the convent, my quarterly reports almost invariably ended with this definition of my moral character: Happy disposition, sound mind, gravity beyond her years, well-balanced nature. Conscience, however, a little uneasy. Conscience a little uneasy --I do not deny it; but as to the rest, asking pardon of these ladies, I must be allowed to assert the direct opposite. And as my beloved instructresses were mistaken, it is not astonishing that the world should be deceived also. I fancy that the cause of these false judgments is my external appearance. I am a dark brunette and pale; my expression, of a tiresome unchangeability, is as severe as that of a young girl can be. Somewhat pronounced near-sightedness lends a look of sleepy indifference to my black eyes (whoso brilliancy would without this troublesome circumstance certainly be too striking). Besides, I have naturally a calm manner of speaking, walking, sitting, and of moving noiselessly, which gives an observer an illusory impression of tranquil serenity. I have neither the desire nor the means of correcting the opinion of the public in this respect; and, until there is a new order of things, my locked diary alone will know that this grave, wise, and well-balanced Charlotte is at heart an excessively romantic and impulsive young person. And this is precisely why I am so late in beginning this magnificent locked diary, which I so enthusiastically...
