The compulsory principle was almost unanimously accepted from the first, probably because of the Prussian and alleged American examples. The old quibble, that education if compulsory must be free, next did service. Then, it having been assumed that the State must be teacher, it became manifest that the different groups who opposed the Bill, not being agreed among themselves, were utterly unprepared to answer the question, which particular religion is to be taught The only logical solution was, no religious teaching at all. The Bill passed triumphantly through committee on the 19th October, and came into force on the 1st January, 1873. Zealous Roman Catholics at once rejected the new Act. They refused to accept State aid on the official terms, and went out into the wilderness. 5 And there they are still. But they set to work to build new schools and to provide for the schooling of as many children as possible¹. The Church of England, Presbyterians, Wesleyans, and other Protestants determined, on the contrary, to give the Act a fair trial; as some put it, they walked straight into the trap. They gave up control of their schools and surrendered the buildings to Government, receiving compensation for valid interests, and have made no attempt to carry on voluntary elementary schools since 1873. r Morley, writing on the Victorian experiment at the time, gracefully describes what was done by Mr. Stephen in 1872 as throwing a handful...
