Excerpt: .that the demands of man for a habitation in which he would be supreme should evolve out of his necessities this very simple and successful mode of home making, and while only the minority really do secure homes through its aid, nine out of ten enter the association for the purpose of purchasing real estate, and, although many stop short of that, they have acquired an accumulation of money--that great purchasing power---and it is a very common practice with men who in such an association for the first time in their lives save money to let it accumulate until with the savings thus formed real estate is purchased. The question is frequently asked, does it pay a poor man with no other resources than his own earnings to take a loan from a building association, where he is obliged to pay interest, premium, dues,...
