From an acquaintance with the state of business, and the general situation of merchants in the city of New York; from personal observation of the immediate effects of the recent calamity; and from inquiry into the probable extent of its wide-spread consequences, I have been convinced of the importance, nay, of the absolute necessity of some early provision, on the part of this Government, for the relief of its debtors in that city; and, upon reflection, I am satisfied that it is not more the impulse of liberality than the obvious dictate of sound policy to do at least all that is proposed in this bill. The bill provides for two objects: first, the relief of such debtors of the Government as were immediate sufferers by the fire; and, secondly, the relief of all who were indebted to the Government in the city of New York at the time when the fire occurred. The proposed relief is confined, in both cases, to debtors of the Government, and consists simply of an extension, without interest, of the time of payment of bonds given to secure the duties upon goods recently imported. This relief it is proposed to afford in the largest measure to the immediate sufferers, and in a less degree to the others who are supposed to be...
