But as we neared the old elm that threw its shade over the seats upon the village green, we discerned a group of rustics silently drinking in the homely words of Old Solomon, who was giving them his earnest talk anent this great farmer and his solitary son. We drew near, and respectfully heeded the old man s sermon. My friends, he began, if I go on this road I shall soon be as great a preacher as the pa son hisself, though I do preach outside, and he do preach inside. But it s your own fault. I should never do it if you didn t push me to it by saying over almost everything as happens in the parish: What do you think about it, Solomon? So...
