Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: . at once both harmony and reason; so in this same previous representation they simultaneously involve the germ of what we call the feelings. --Psychology, p. 585. And again, p. 590, As the psychical changes become too complicated to be perfectly automatic, they become incipiently sensational. Memory, reason, and feeling take their rise at the same time. 1. Corresponding to absolute external relations, i.e. in the universe around us, there are developed itt the nervous system absolute internal relations, developed before birth, antecedent to, and independent of individual experiences, and that are automatically established along with the very first cognitions. 2. These internal relations, nevertheless, are not independent of experiences in general, but have been established by the accumulated experiences of preceding organisms, handed down by heredity from parent to offspring. 3. Hence the brain represents an infinitude of experiences received during the whole evolution of life in general. The most uniform and characteristic of these experiences have been successively bequeathed, principal and interest, from father to son, and have thus slowly amounted to that high intelligence which is latent in the brain of the infant, which the infant, in the course of its after life, exercises and usually strengthens or further complicates, and which, with minute additions, it again bequeaths to future generations.1 1 Psychology, p. 583. I should be sorry to deny there is much truth in all this. It must, I think, be admitted that life means the power of adaptation and correspondence...
